

Italy During the World War (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Italy During the World War The idea of a book meant primarily for Americans and which would gather the living description of the spirit and talk of Italy and her achievements during the war, was bound to appeal to and inspire the high mind of a man whose personality includes these two nations and who, having gone to Italy as an American charged with the work of research and propaganda, felt and understood as an Italian the essence of the events and of the men who were their exponents. Like all truths this book does not appear too late, for the light that has gradually pierced through the public consciousness finds in it a warm affirmation and, above all, a precise and eloquent documentation. A summary of its subject matter would do it but scant justice; it must be read as it is, for nothing else could be effectively substituted for what is written in its pages and nothing can take the place of what is set forth in the last chapter Lest we forget. Italy is marching forth securely to her future, conscious of having accomplished her full duty towards all, and proud of having again found in her people, those virtues which have always predestined her to be, in the world, a firm and steadfast element of civilization. To Senator Cotillo the merit of his book, to the Americans and all other chosen minds the perusal of it, to the Italians the all-pure satisfaction of having been understood by a mind that has been able to so nobly comprehend and appreciate.
