Not illustrated. 1921 Excerpt: ... see the first rushing Soviet automobiles, shooting along at an alarming speed, a speed to raise your hair on end. A military speed, a campaign speed, a speed for providing the munitions, a speed to replace men at the front. My first impression: It is a city of proletarians. The worker rules, the worker dominates the streets, the life of the city. We enter the Nevsky Prospect, the principal business and pleasure street of the old empire. Many shops are boarded up, many shops are still open and doing business, but it is clear at first sight that they are selling out superfluous things, gewgaws, perfumes, expensive writing paper, photographs, pictures; 400 Soviet rubles for a small bottle of perfume, 500 Soviet rubles for a small silver mesh purse. I later grasped the money problem and was no longer surprised. Nevsky Prospect is very lively about noon, there are no hitches in traffic. At street corners cigarettes and pastries are being sold, and these places are respectfully avoided by foot traffic. Everywhere you still see the old signboards of former pastry-shops, tailors, etc. As a financial writer I am interested particularly in the bank buildings. The staff of the Seventh Army was engaged in counter-revolutionary activities at this time and was ready to hand over the city to Yudenich. Fortunately the plots were discovered in time, (see article entitled The Accomplices of Paul Dukes, in Soviet Russia, Vol. II, No. 23, page 560) and due punishment was meted out to the traitors. The English not only supported Yudenich, but also were generally responsible for this counter-revolutionary attempt from within.--Editor, Soviet Russia. In my day I produced many a criticism of Petrograd stock speculation, contributed to German commercial papers. Now th...
