

Tibet and The Tibetans

Excerpt: In the following pages have been epitomized the results of many years of personal investigation into Tibetan mysteries. The unique physical features, the geology, the botany, the zoology of the country, also the characteristics, occupations, religion, and literature of the inhabitants, are the subjects mainly treated of. Much of the matter included here had been put in type before the conclusion of the recent political Mission to Tibet. However, few new facts concerning Tibet were revealed by this Mission. It is, moreover, a testimony to the fulness of the information brought back in previous years by the secret native agents of the Transfrontier Survey, that our own description of Lhasa in these pages (derived mainly from the private reports of these agents) tallies in most particulars with the accounts of the city as now described by the English visitors of 1904. Only, the native explorers in question seem on the whole to have been a little more exact in their narratives than the English visitors. GRAHAM SANDBERG. London: 1 January, 1905.
