

The self-immolation of a Tunisian street vendor set in motion a series of events that would fundamentally change the political landscape of the entire Middle East and North Africa region—a period we now call the Arab Spring. Finally fed up with autocratic rule, with corruption, with a lack of basic freedoms, thousands of Tunisians took to the streets calling for democratic and social reforms and an end to the maligned 23-year rule of their leader. But though there has been some significant progress made since his ouster, there is still so much that needs to be done to meet the goals and the aspirations of the Tunisian people.
